A one room prairie school building, used today for a granary. The building, which measures 36 feet north to south and 22 feet east to west, has a hip roof with some shakes left under asphalt shingles that are also mostly gone. The roof peak and four seams are all covered with asphalt shingle material. There is a brick chimney toward the south end of the school. The soffits are closed and there is an 8 inch board trimming all four sides just under the roof overhang.

The siding is mostly 6 inch lap siding with the east wall mostly sheets of metal siding to cover where the windows were located. There is a plywood door leading into the school on that east side. At the southwest corner of the school there are two opening for doors, both doors now gone. They lead into a small entry area that then goes into the cloak room which was along the south wall. The walls in this area are a mixture of bead board and lathe and plaster. Both areas are full of junk. The flooring is wood tongue and groove. Looking into the main body of the school there is a half wall of plywood covering the doorway to allow for grain storage. The door is still there, suspect they close that when it is full of grain. The main body of the school was totally gutted for use for a granary.
